In the realm of fashion, Modernism had a profound impact. The early 20th century saw the rise of new styles such as Art Nouveau and Art Deco, which rejected the elaborate designs of the Victorian era in favor of simpler, more streamlined forms.

In the 1950s, a new youth culture emerged in Britain that embraced Modernism. Known as the Mods, these young people were known for their sharp style, which included tailored suits, button-down shirts, and Chelsea boots. The Mods were followed by the Casuals in the 1970s. The Casuals were a more relaxed and informal subculture that favored sportswear and casual clothing. Their style was influenced by the sportswear of football hooligans, and they often wore designer labels such as Adidas and Nike.

The Mods and Casuals were two of the most influential youth subcultures of the 20th century. Their style has had a lasting impact on fashion, and it continues to inspire designers and fashionistas today.

The Mods

The Mods were a youth subculture that emerged in London in the early 1960s. They were known for their sharp style, which was inspired by Italian fashion and French New Wave cinema. The Mods favored tailored suits, button-down shirts, and Chelsea boots. They also wore their hair short and slicked back.

The Mods were a music-oriented subculture. They listened to a wide range of music, including soul, R&B, and ska. They also attended dance clubs and all-night parties.

The Mods were a controversial subculture. They were often seen as being too violent and too fashionable. However, they also had a positive impact on British culture. They helped to popularize soul and R&B music, and they played a role in the development of the British fashion industry.
