The berserkers were a group of Viking warriors who were known for their ferocity in battle. They were said to be able to enter a trance-like state, in which they became immune to pain and fought with superhuman strength. This state was often accompanied by a frenzy of violence, and the berserkers were often feared by their enemies.

The music of the berserkers was an important part of their culture. It was used to prepare them for battle, to celebrate their victories, and to mourn their dead. The music was often loud and aggressive, and it was often played on traditional Scandinavian instruments, such as the langeleik, the talharpa, and the bukkehorn.

The Instruments of the Berserkers

The langeleik is a stringed instrument that is played by plucking the strings with a plectrum. It has a long, narrow body and a fretted neck. The talharpa is a bowed stringed instrument that is played by holding it against the shoulder and bowing the strings with a horsehair bow. It has a round body and a short, unfretted neck. The bukkehorn is a horn that is made from the horn of a goat or a bull. It is played by blowing into the mouthpiece and producing a loud, resonant sound.
